It is sometimes possible to ask a question which will throw no light on the subject under discussion (which will, it seems, merely confuse things). And it is sometimes possible to ask a question which will throw light on the subject under discussion, even though the question will involve some of the more interesting and questionable aspects of the subject. The last type of question, I have called the question whose answer serves to illuminate; it is sometimes possible to ask a question whose answer serves to illuminate even though there is no answer to the question.

The last kind of question is always fun to ask, and especially fun to ask a famous person to ask. A famous person has all the time in the world and has nothing to lose, as is the rule of his trade. Also, he is usually so delighted to be asked to ask that his contribution to the proceedings of the society will be an enlivening and enlightening one. The most difficult thing to do is to ask somebody a question which has no answer, or, at least, which will throw no light on the 3e33713323
