Review article: do we need to change our practice? The aim of this review is to update the current knowledge on fever. Currently, there are more than 16,000 suggested or even proposed fever-lowering treatment guidelines for sepsis. The review focuses on the three phases of the fever episode: the early treatment phase (24 to 48 hours), the slow fever phase (3 to 7 days) and the late (≥ 7 days) phase. Non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (NSAIDs) and paracetamol are the first-line drugs for the early phase and antimalarials and systemic corticosteroids for the slow and late phases. The major clinical studies in sepsis suggest the lack of an appreciable beneficial effect of fever treatment, and although NSAIDs increase sepsis patient's mortality, paracetamol reduces it. The different strategies evaluated in clinical trials have not showed significant differences between them: NSAIDs versus paracetamol, paracetamol versus antimalarials and antipyretics, and NSAIDs versus antimalarials or antipyretics. The main limitations of the trials are, first, the very heterogeneous populations, including the different levels of severity of patients and the different methods to define a fever episode; second, the fact that most of the clinical studies have not used the whole therapy duration; third, the use of a very broad definition of fever, including several symptoms and self-reported fevers. Based on this, it seems that, in sepsis patients, the use of antipyretics or NSAIDs to reduce fever is not effective and the development of new anti-pyretic drugs seems not to be necessary.
