This invention relates to a frame for installation on the head of a person to support eyeglasses and/or reading spectacles. The frame is shaped to accommodate the head of a person and has a number of features which help protect the wearer from injury, such as impact from a head-on collision. The inventor has been in the eyewear business for over fifteen years, much of it, in the area of prescription eyeglasses, having been devoted to the design and development of eyewear constructed in a manner to protect users from injury when struck by objects, such as a car. One of the major causes of injury to individuals is head-on collisions. The head of a person contains an inner skull, which is quite resilient. At the same time, this inner skull is encased in a relatively rigid external skull, which is typically made from a shell of several bone plates. The inner skull is generally not harmed in a typical head-on collision, but the impact on the external skull often causes the person to lose consciousness. While the inventor is not aware of any prior art which deals directly with the design and construction of frames to help protect the user from head-on collisions, this inventor is aware of four patents which deal with the idea of protecting head-on collisions. These four patents, each of which is incorporated herein by reference, are as follows: _____ U.S. Pat. No. Inventor Issue Date _____ 2,841,344 H. A. Warrick Dec. 17, 1957 2,865,843 J. P. LOURENÇO & LOURIVAL "BIG APE" - INTRO (FULL VERSION) - Embodiments of the present invention relate generally to charging circuit systems and methods of use of such systems, and more specifically, to charging circuit systems and methods used in a wireless communication system employing multicarrier modulation. Wireless communication systems are well known in the art. Generally, such systems comprise communication stations, or base stations, which transmit and receive wireless communication signals, and users with wireless transmit/receive units (WTRUs) that transmit and receive the wireless signals. In turn, the base stations provide wireless service within particular geographic regions. In order to provide the wireless service and accommodate increased usage, the geographical regions can be divided into smaller regions called cells. As such, a base station can provide wireless service to many WTRUs. When a user initially turns on its WTRU, power control commands are sent to the WTRU to ensure that the WTRU receives service from the base station in an efficient manner. In addition, the WTRU may adjust power levels to maximize power consumption. As such, the power levels can be set for several parameters. For example, some parameters that can be changed by a WTRU to optimize its power consumption are transmit power, required signal quality, modulation type, coding rate, frame structure, number of physical channels and various types of current conserving power saving features. In many communications systems, the users' data is transmitted and received using a multicarrier modulation scheme. A multicarrier modulation scheme can
