Enhancing enzymatic hydrolysis of lignocellulosic biomass by feeding steam: biogas potential analysis. The effects of steam feeding on a commercial cellulase enzymatic hydrolysis of a lignocellulosic feedstock, wheat straw, were investigated. Hydrolysis experiments were performed in a vessel with a working volume of 3.35 L at 50°C, with removal of the process vapors from the vessel by a flexible tubular condensing heat exchanger. The experiments were performed without and with steam feeding (condensed steam only or steam supplemented with 15.0 g/L Na<sub>2</sub>SO<sub>4</sub> (wt/wt)). At steam addition rates of 8.0 g/L (condensed steam-only) and 15.0 g/L (steam supplemented with Na<sub>2</sub>SO<sub>4</sub>), the efficiency of enzymatic hydrolysis improved significantly. The hydrolysis rate, expressed as xylose yield, increased from 68% to 94% after steam feeding. The application of steam in a vessel with a high solids content has the potential to reduce enzyme usage, as the product production may be achieved with fewer enzymes and operating costs. The biogas potential analysis indicates that the hydrolysate produced under steam feed conditions would have a biogas potential of 0.28-0.31 L biogas/m<sup>3</sup> of solids. This analysis also indicates that 30-40% of the biogas produced can be released into the atmosphere, while the remaining 60-70% can be recovered for utility. Cerebral blood flow and metabolism during sulpiride treatment in patients with severe schizophrenia: a PET study. Dopaminergic dysfunction in schizophrenia has been described as decreased D(2) receptor function, especially in the limbic regions. The therapeutic efficacy of antipsychotics can be influenced by the development of tolerance. The aim of this PET study was to investigate the effects of a therapeutic dose (100 mg) of sulpiride on regional cerebral blood flow (rCBF) and the regional cerebral metabolic rate of glucose (rCMRgl) in patients with severe schizophrenia, before and after treatment, in comparison to healthy subjects. The study was performed before and at least 3 weeks after the start of sulpiride. <sup>13</sup>N-ammonia and <sup>18</sup>F-fluorodeoxyglucose PET were used to measure rCBF and rCMRgl, respectively. A decrease in rCBF and an
