Text can be typed on a keyboard, or entered through one of a number of graphical user interface (GUI) means which allow text to be entered much more easily. As text is entered in conventional computing, information such as letters and numbers can be input in a straightforward manner. However, problems have arisen because the user must know precisely how to enter text in order to enter various forms of text in the manner required. For example, a user must know how to enter mathematical expression such as an exponential, write a string of alphabetic characters, or enter a character that belongs to the punctuation class. It has been very difficult to assist a user in the proper entry of such text since it is sometimes quite complicated to achieve this input in the manner required. One approach to allow a user to more easily enter text is to develop text entry devices for handheld computing devices such as personal digital assistants (PDA's) and the like. However, these devices are not generally capable of entering text in the manner required by many computer users. For example, graphical user interface (GUI) text entry devices on such devices are generally designed to allow text to be entered by clicking a graphical area on a screen (usually a mouse click) and a character appearing on the screen is then input by pressing a single button. Such systems generally require the user to be able to see the text being input, which is often not possible in many situations. An approach which allows an easily accessible method for text entry is needed. Unleashing the tools With our latest update to Nike+ Training Club (Nike+ TCC), runners can get more information about their workout. This feature allows users to easily assess their activity including steps, speed, distance, distance covered, location, and more - as well as other key elements of a run that can help personalize your workout. With easy-to-read charts, maps, and graphs, they can monitor their progress as well as understanding the true impact of their training. The new NTC is already generating enthusiasm among runners around the globe, and we're excited to be
