Bloons 2 is the spiritual sequel to the cult classic shooter Bloons. The first game was one of the first to successfully use pixel art in a game, and it was a massive success. The Bloons Bouncing Badass was the first game to hit 2 million copies sold, and at its peak it made $120,000 a day. Hardly a week passes without a new Bloons game arriving on the scene, and most of them are far more successful than the game that originally made that money. Which of course is why the people involved in Bloons have gotten sick of the money that's made and how little they get from it. April Fool's Day is a big day in gaming. So much so that the world's biggest indie game publisher, The Behemoth, decided to have a bit of fun on April 1. The CEO proudly unveiled a very simple game design idea, and announced the same day he was going to give up his $10,000 annual salary to make that idea a reality.

According to the in-game tutorial the player is a dinosaur in an island world. However this game feature went into a completely different category than the anti-piracy system of the same name. The Tile-Hunt & The Great Escape A dinosaur dies in an island prison, and the player must find their way to an exit before some feathery friend eats them. (In-game tutorial used) If you fail to find the exit before the checkpoint is reached the game ends and you need to start over. You could do this 30 times, and the player would only receive the first reward at the checkpoint. However it's also possible to reach the destination, open the door and then another checkpoint will appear that's even further away from the other checkpoints the player had already reached. Such is the genius of the game the player will die, see their progress fade out, but it will come back around for them so that they can keep trying to get out. The player's progress can also be re-wound when they die, and the game can be paused at any time.
